Henry began to seek for another wife; and hearing reports of the beauty of the daughter of the Duke of Cleves, a German prince, he sent the painter Holbein to take her likeness for him. Holbein painted so lovely a picture, that, quite charmed, he sent in great haste to offer his hand to the Lady Anne of Cleves; but when she arrived in England he was filled with anger and disappointment. The portrait had been too flattering, and the lady proved to be a tall, stout, awkward Dutch woman, ill dressed, and with heavy features marked with the small-pox. At the first sight of her he fell into a passion, declaring that they had brought him a great Flanders mare by way of a queen. She was a good kind-hearted woman, but without the dignity of Katharine of Arragon, the playful grace of Anne Boleyn, or the beauty of Jane Seymour; and in a very short time Henry cast his eyes on a fair English lady, named Katharine Howard. He did not venture to put Anne to death, because her foreign friends were powerful; but he divorced her, giving her for her abode Richmond Palace, where she spent the rest of her life. The next queen, Katharine Howard, was the orphan child of a gallant sailor, Lord Edmund Howard, who had been slain while fighting in the Kings service. She had grown up in the house of her grandmother, the Duchess of Norfolk,...
