The one was icy, the other hot--she knew not which. She laughed again--she did not seem able to help laughing to-night. You silly little thing! Yes, of course I am well, she answered gaily. Listen, theres the music--it has begun again--another valse, my favourite one--and Im engaged for everything. Come along, Aggie; you know I can never keep my feet quiet when I hear the tempting strains. As she spoke, she ran out into the hall, where there were knots and groups of people all ready to welcome and do obeisance to their hostess. How pretty she is! Approving murmurs rose on all sides as she passed, as she floated on, laughing and talking, and making her way towards the ball-room. Lucky dog, Delachaine! said one. Awfully excitable, I should say, came an answer. Most good-looking women are; queer creatures, mere butterflies of fashion. Especially when theyre young, etc. , etc. CHAPTER VIII. Time passed. The housewarming party had long since dispersed. Christmas had come and gone, spent quietly at the Court. Lord Delachaine was not fond of anniversaries, but he considered it right to keep up old traditions, and he was therefore willing to concede a certain amount of festivity on all such occasions as were dignified or sanctified by custom. Consequently, his agent was annually instructed to dispense seasonable charities to the poor, and tokens of goodwill to the tenants, whilst a fair amount of roast...
